Cattle Movement Subject of Meet

If Oregon cattlemen want their cattle to move into the state of Washington more freely Oregon will have to reactivate the testing for brucellosis of all eligible cattle back to the farm or feed lots from auction yards.

This was emphasized at a recent meeting at Bellingham, Wn., of state-federal regulatory personnel of Oregon and Washington and representatives of the cattlemen's associations of both states.

At present Oregon cattle entering Washington are required to have been tested for brucellosis within the last 30 days before entry.

To meet the stringent requirements for testing that Washington has imposed upon her own cattle and eliminate the testing now required of Oregon cattle going into Washington, Oregon will have to step-up its brucellosis eradication program and have a more complete record on individual herds.

Dr. Glenn B. Rea, state veterinarian, Oregon Department of Agriculture, one of those from Oregon attending the meeting, said the Department of Agriculture will determine the wishes of the cattle industry before any formal action is taken on reactivation of tests on beef cattle going back to the farm or feed lots from auction yards.
