PP&L to Share Power Output At Big New Dam

Customers of Pacific Power & Light Company will share in a large block of the hydroelectric output of the High Mountain Sheep multi-purpose project which the Federal Power Commission has licensed to be constructed on the Snake River on the Oregon-Idaho border by four Northwest electric utility companies.

Reporting on details of the granting of a license to Pacific Northwest Power Company, formed by the four regional investor-owned utilities, Pacific Power's manager said the company serving the local area initially would take into its system serving Washington and Oregon a total of 279,000 kilowatts, or 30 percent of the total generating capability.

"When the power installations are increased to their total ultimate capability, the company's customers will share more than a half-million kilowatts of the output—558,000 kilowatts, to be exact," it was reported by F. L. Gimbel, lineman-agent for PP&L.

The commission held that the High Mountain Sheep site was best adapted to a comprehensive plan of development, according to the PP&L manager. On the second phase of the case, the commission ruled that the Pacific Northwest Power Company had statutory priority for a license to develop this site by virtue of an FPC preliminary permit.

High Mountain sheep would rise 670 feet from foundation to crest and be the highest true-arch concrete structure in the world. It will have a crest reaching 1,460 feet from bank to bank. Its reservoir will reach 58 miles up the Snake River and 10 miles up the Imnaha River.
