short course at Oregon State University last week. The program stressed the or-ganization and operation of grazing and pasture lands. Grazing management is being examined from the standpoint of livestock, soil, wildlife, and plant requirements, observed Dillard Gates, OSU range man-agement specialist in charge of arrangements for this year's workshop.

Adopting a grazing scheme to fit an individual area's resourc-es is the key to this phase of range management. Gates ex-plains. Too often range mana-gers incorrectly assume that they can fit their resources to a previously devised system. The week-long short course not only combined OSU's ex-
