New Spring Wheat Variety Released For Regional Use

A new disease-resistant Federation-type soft white spring wheat, developed by the University of Idaho, is being released for Malheur County and central Oregon wheat growing areas.

Dr. Wilson Foote, assistant director of the Oregon State University Agricultural Experiment Station, said the new variety, Federation-67, is intended to replace the old Federation for production in irrigated areas of southern Idaho and eastern Oregon.

Dr. Warren K. Pope, Idaho plant breeder, developed the variety. Federation-67 is resistant to both stem and stripe rust and has good resistance to mildew and some races of common smut. It outyields the old Federation by as much as 50 percent in years when rusts are prevalent. Pope reported, and does at least as well when disease is not a problem. Quality and growth characteristics are essentially the same as Federation.

The new wheat is being released jointly by the University of Idaho and OSU. Seed stocks will be increased under supervision of the Idaho Crop Improvement Association and supplies will be available through the University of Idaho for 1968 plantings.
