Californians Top State Population On Oregon Visits

There were more Californians in Oregon last year than there were Oregonians. Travel figures released by the Oregon State Highway Department showed that of the 6,547,000 visitors who traveled through the state last year, more than 44 percent, or 2,863,000 were from California. It was announced today by Forrest Cooper, state highway engineer. Latest figures show Oregon's population as 1,999,780.

This large influx of visitors from the south was one reason why the tourist industry in Oregon climbed to a record high of $252,700,000 in spite of crippling strikes in bus and airline service during the height of the season, and intensified competition from other areas. The State of Washington contributed almost 20 percent of the visitor population, or 1,281,000 persons, to further swell the total.

The visitors spent more than $22 million more than they did in 1965 for food, lodging, recreation, car expenses, and other items incidental to travel, the survey conducted by the Highway Department showed. The survey of out-of-state motorists was taken at 17 stations along the state's borders. In addition, estimates were made concerning visitors traveling by train, plane, or bus, and persons on business trips who used travel facilities.

The automobile survey showed the estimated number of motoring visitors up to 6.5 million from 5.8 million for the previous year, with their total expenditures up more than $3.2 million. Visitors arriving by mass transportation means spent almost a million dollars less than the previous year. This was believed caused by the major strikes in the bus and airline services.
