Lockjaw Death Points Up Need For Tetanus Shots

Oregon recorded its first death of the year from tetanus (lockjaw) this month—a 4-year-old Washington County girl—and the State Board of Health this week advised all parents to make certain they and their children are protected against the deadly germ.

Investigation showed the girl suffered a splinter wound in her foot, showed symptoms of serious illness about a week later and died a few days later despite treatment.

Records show seven Oregonians have died of tetanus since 1955. The last death was in 1965. Two victims of the germ last year were saved by injections of tetanus-immune gamma globulin, but were seriously ill and incapacitated for many months.

With advent of summer and an increase in outdoor activities that invite cuts and other injuries, the Board said it is urgent to have tetanus immunization and boosters at regular intervals to assure 100 percent protection against the bacillus.

Immunization comes in two forms. Children from two months through six years old should receive a combination vaccine, DPT, for diphtheria, pertussis (whooping cough), and tetanus. The first immunization at three months old, is followed by two more doses at intervals of four weeks. A booster is needed one year after the initial series, after injury, and again before the time of school entrance.

For adults and children over seven, a combined dose of DT vaccine is used. This weaker, "adult-type" diphtheria and tetanus protects the older age groups. This initial two injections should be followed by DT boosters every four years and a booster in case of injury.

Tetanus protection is particularly important for gardeners and farmers who work with manure since tetanus is often present in these organic wastes.

Actually, the Board points out, tetanus germs are present everywhere and are deadly once they enter the tissues, particularly through deep puncture wounds since they thrive on a lack of oxygen.

Tetanus symptoms include violent contractions of the muscles, first noticeable in the neck and jaws. The spasms are often so severe that they actually destroy the muscles. Left unchecked, tetanus paralyzes the respiratory system and causes death. About 50 percent of tetanus cases are fatal if the victims are not immunized.

The Board advises those unprotected against tetanus to consult their physician or local health department for further information and protection against the disease.

Two from Heppner Make U of O Honors

Martha Jane Doherty, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Bernard J. Doherty, and Margaret Alma Green, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Herman J. Green, both of Heppner, are on the spring term honor roll at the University of Oregon, the university's news bureau reports.

The honor roll, containing the names of undergraduates who achieved grade point averages of 3.50 or higher during spring term, lists a record total of 733 students. Ninety-five students made grade point averages of 4.00, or all A grades.

Grade point averages at the University are based on a scale with A scored at 4.00; B as 3.00; and C as 2.00.

Mayor Charles O'Connor made the presentation. Other special guests were District Deputy-elect Lavern Christiansen of Irrigon and Mrs. Christiansen.

Live music for the dance was furnished by the Three Blind Mice of Pendleton. Kindergarten mothers prepared and served the dinner.
