They had expected to leave Monday and to be gone until about July 20. Everybody benefits when Rural Electric go all out for service

America's consumer-owned rural electric systems are proud of their reputation for providing electric service wherever it is needed.

Recently, one electric co-op was called upon to erect poles and string lines across two miles of almost impassable marsh to an isolated consumer.

Applying rural electric ingenuity, the co-op hired a helicopter to set the 28 poles, weighing 1100 pounds each, and string the two miles of heavy wire. What would have normally been a five-week construction job was accomplished in two days.

Even more important, a whole new area has been supplied with reliable electric service. The power needs of job-producing new industries can be met, residents of the area can purchase electrical appliances for their farms and homes, additional recreational facilities can be developed for city dwellers, and our nation's program of rural area development has taken another step forward.

Working hard to provide service and develop the economy of our rural areas is a basic tenet of the rural electric tradition. Today rural electric serve an average of 3.3 consumers per mile of line compared with the 33 consumers per mile of line served by commercial power companies.

Providing these scattered consumer-members with electric power takes extra effort and careful management but rural electric know it's necessary to keep our country growing . . . And everybody benefits.
