'Golden Eagle' Rules Enforced

National Forest campground users are reminded that collection of fees at "Golden Eagle" sites is being enforced more closely this year.

Persons using facilities without having paid $1 daily fee or without being in possession of the annual $7 "Golden Eagle Passport" are being issued notices of violation. For example, in the period May 26 to June 7, there were 17 notices of violation issued at Diamond Lake, Umpqua National Forest, one of the most heavily used recreation areas in the Pacific Northwest.

Biggest complaint from users in the first three years of operation of the pay program was lack of enforcement, according to Regional Forester Charles A. Connaughton, U. S. Forest Service. He emphasized that there is no charge to visit the National Forests, "but the nationwide Golden Eagle program for developed recreation sites must be administered in a manner that is fair to all." Twenty percent of the 1,208 developed campgrounds in the National Forests of Oregon and Washington are under the pay program. Persons caught in violation are summoned to appear before a U. S. Commissioner, who will determine the penalty. The Land and Water Conservation Fund (Golden Eagle) Act provides for fine of up to $100.
