Adventist Churches Have Relief Program Locally and Abroad

Seventh-day Adventist churches gave more than $300,000 to relief for victims of the war in East Nigeria, according to a report just received from church world headquarters.

On Saturday, Heppner Adventists will focus their giving on general disaster and famine relief.

Henry Preston, pastor, explains that the church's relief program is supported further by volunteer hours on the part of members here, who process and sort clothing and other materials received by the Health and Welfare Department of the local church. A certain portion of these materials is sent to its Watsonville, Calif., relief depot for distribution in other areas of the world.

The Heppner organization helped out several families of this area who suffered the loss of homes and/or personal belongings by fire last winter.

Volunteer work, associated with Adventists' relief programs, greatly extends the use of funds of SAWS (Seventh-day Adventist Welfare Service, Inc.) Distribution of food, clothing, medical supplies, and other needed items totaled nearly three million dollars in value last year.
