NRA Supports Bill To Finance Training With Handgun Taxes

The National Rifle Association is urging Congress to channel Federal excise taxes on handguns into firearms safety training programs and wildlife restoration.

Under existing law funds derived from the 11% excise tax on the sale of rifles, shotguns and ammunition are made available to the states for wildlife restoration programs. However, revenues from the 10% excise tax on manufacturers' sales of pistols and revolvers become part of the general fund of the U. S. Treasury and do not go into such programs.

The bill supported by NRA (HR 1048, by Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich.) would divide handgun taxes evenly between wildlife restoration and firearms safety training programs, including range construction. An estimated total of more than $4 million per year is involved. The House Subcommittee on Fisheries and Wildlife, of which Mr. Dingell is chairman, is holding hearings on the bill.

In representing NRA at the hearings, Franklin L. Orth, NRA Executive Vice President, emphasized the importance of earmarking a sizable portion of handgun excise tax funds for construction of ranges on which firearms safety would be taught. Orth said:

"With millions of firearms in private hands in an estimated 60 million households, and with 147 million licensed hunters in 1968, there is obviously a great need for adequate facilities upon which to practice marksmanship, to sight-in hunting firearms so as to be assured that any shot that is fired will go where aimed, and especially to learn basic firearms safety."

"The current population explosion in America, however, has acted to produce a serious loss of range facilities. Generally, as urban areas expand, ranges disappear. I estimate that three ranges are being lost for every new range constructed presently under NRA programs. Hence, this country needs new ranges everywhere for marksmanship training and for the safety of the hunter himself as well as the public at large".

Orth pointed out the importance of firearms safety training in reducing accidents. He reported that 2,600 persons died as a result of all types of firearms accidents in 1968, a decrease of 10% from 1967.

All 50 states have some form of hunter safety training available to their citizens, he said. In 15 states passage of a state-sponsored hunter safety course is required in order to obtain a hunting license for the first time, and in 26 states a similar program is operated on a voluntary basis. Most of these are administered by volunteer workers acting under the auspices of NRA and/or State Fish and Game Commissions.

"These programs have played an instrumental role in achieving this safety record", Orth said. "There is ample evidence to support the conclusion that rerouting funds as provided in HR 1048 for range facilities and hunter safety programs would substantially reduce the figure cited above.

Orth continued: "There has been a decrease in hunting accidents despite an increased number of hunters resulting from the general population explosion. The National Safety Council has indicated that hunting is one of the few areas where there is a declining rate of accidents."

"Despite the comparatively good record, however, much more needs to be done. I am convinced that with proper training and access to adequate facilities, the existing accident fatality rate could be reduced to a very small fraction of the present number. In short, there is a demonstrated need for which there is a practical and feasible solution at no cost to the government".
