Safe Tomato Canning

Tomatoes were commonly canned much as any fruit was canned. This became a problem because many tomatoes are low in acid and therefore require pressure canning.

After research, a safe canning method for low acid varieties has been developed according to Molly Saul's bulletin.

Hot Pack: Bring whole peeled tomatoes to a boil. Pack immediately into hot jars. Cover with hot liquid in which the tomatoes were heated. Leave ½-inch head space. Add three teaspoons vinegar or two teaspoons lemon juice and one teaspoon salt to each quart. Seal. Process both pints and quarts for 15 minutes in boiling water bath.

Raw Pack: Pack raw, whole, peeled tomatoes tightly to the tops of hot jars. Press tomatoes down after each two tomatoes are added, to release juice and to fill space. Leave ½ inch head space. Add three teaspoons vinegar or two teaspoons lemon juice and one teaspoon salt to each quart. Seal. Process both pints and quarts for 50 minutes in boiling water.

A lot of punch packed in one kilowatt hour
Customers are often puzzled by the term "kilowatt hours," the units in which electricity is billed each month. To quickly define a kilowatt hour, it is only necessary to point out that this energy unit is equal to the use of 1,000 watts for a period of one hour. Expressed in common household terms, a kilowatt hour of electricity is consumed by using a 100 watt lamp for 10 hours or operating a color television set (350 watts) for nearly three hours.

If a man was to duplicate the energy contained in just one kilowatt hour of electricity, he would have to exert himself for 13 hours in hard, manual labor. His work efforts, expressed in another way, are only equivalent to about one-tenth of a horsepower per hour.
