DOTS JOTS

One of the sweetest things at Linda Kahr's wedding was to see her brother Del take the two little Panter dolls, Sarena and Averille, by the hand and come down the aisle after the ceremony. And me without my camera!

It's great to have the big clock in the steeple fixed. I love to hear it strike. It's like having an old friend back. There's only one thing wrong it also tells me how late Dewey and I are when we're on our way to work!

Jimmy Schaffitz is all excited about going to Dallas, Texas to meet Steve Sather for a "play in". He says he's on his way to fame and fortune. I just can't get excited about Texas in July but we wish the boys lots of luck.

Did you by any chance see those huge green pipes laid at the new Catholic Church building last week? It was about 18" in diameter, plastic with plastic welded seams and was laid in a trench then cement poured over the top. Carries the heat in winter and the cool air for summer. Really the latest thing. Mr. Vixie, the contractor told me, I took a picture but it didn't turn out. It was really too pretty to be buried in cement!

Chemical Makes Sheep Give up Their Fleece

Sheep can be fleeced out of their wool with a pill.

From 10 days to a month after getting a dose of CPA (cyclophosphamide) an adult sheep's wool becomes loose enough to be pulled off easily by hand. This not only eliminates the cost of a professional shearer but also improves wool quality by eliminating short fibers from second cuts by the shearing machine.

"However, there are drawbacks to using the chemical," said Dr. William D. Hohenboken, assistant professor of animal science at Oregon State University, who is testing the chemical on about 150 sheep of the OSU flock.

"The biggest problem is variability. Wool on different sheep is not ready for pulling at the same time, and often, wool on the different parts of an animal is ready at different times."

Some sheep apparently do not react to the chemical at all. Age does not seem to be a factor in response to CPA but the breed does, said Hohenboken.

He is conducting the only experimental studies in Oregon to find out how practical CPA can be.

The chemical was first used as a possible drug for leukemia, bone marrow cancer. After dosage, man patients lost their hair. When USDA scientists tried it on sheep, the animal lost their wool.

Wool fibers grow in a pocket-like follicle under the skin surface. As pre-wool cells divide, the wool fiber is pushed toward the skin surface.

CPA stops cell division, causing a constriction in the wool fiber. When the constriction reaches the skin surface, the fleece can be pulled off by hand, pretty much in one piece.

If the fleece is removed 10 days after treatment, the animal is left bare, without even the light cover left by shears. Exposure can be a problem until enough wool grows back to protect the sheep.

Hohenboken, who seeks more precise answers on dosage of CPA and its full effects, said a chemical company has asked clearance for sale of the chemical from the Federal Food and Drug Administration.

Bookworms will resume their meetings on September 14 at the home of Mrs. Jim Thomson at which time they will elect new officers.
