Watch Out For Licorice Addicts

Ex-smokers switch to all kinds of substitutes. Like licorice drops. It sounds harmless enough. But sometimes it isn't.

According to a recent United Press International report, one man was rushed to the Bryn Mawr Hospital in Pennsylvania as an emergency patient. He had most of the signs of a heart attack, but diagnostic tests showed no attack had in fact occurred. However the heart muscle was behaving badly. The man's body chemistry was too alkaline, and the potassium in his blood was at a critically low level. There were also symptoms of kidney failure.

After 24 hours of tests, the patient happened to mention that he had quit cigarettes three months earlier and now ate licorice drops instead. Surprised by the serious interest of the examining physicians, he said he had been eating about a quarter of a pound every day for months.

As a result of this case, the word is being spread through the medical world to watch out for licorice addiction among ex-smokers. Licorice depletes the amount of potassium in the blood that is necessary to keep the heart pumping.

Once the diagnosis of "licorice intoxication" was confirmed, it took 33 days in the hospital to restore the normal level of potassium in the man's blood. But at the end of that time, all his symptoms were gone.

Too much of any one substitute for cigarette smoking can have ominous repercussions. But quitting smoking, accompanied by sensible substitutes, is an essential step toward health.

To find out more about the hazards of smoking and how to quit as painlessly as possible, check with your local tuberculosis and respiratory disease association. It's a matter of life and breath.
