Kindergarten Is Learning

important thing we do. I try to make them realize that if they do their work well, it is something to be proud of. They are at a point now where they like to work better than they like to play."

When the kindergarten takes up in the fall, much time is spent getting the students to overcome their shyness and learn to get along. "That is the first step," according to Mrs. Jones, who has been teaching at kindergarten for four years. "Then as time goes along, we advance right along, until now many of the students are doing work that used to be taken care of in the first grade. I cooperate with the first grade teachers."

Proof of this is the young girl who can read her book without difficulty, and the boy who writes his letters right through. Each day, Mrs. Jones follows a schedule in her teaching. She works to find a balance between playtime, work and recreation—music and art. "We're really here to learn," Mrs. Jones insists. "Too many people feel that the kindergarten is just for letting the kids play, but that really isn't it at all. They learn their letters, numbers, songs, and things like what country, county and town we live in, who was the first president, who is president now, and who made the first flag. They color, do dot to dot pictures, and drawings. We work on using their eyes and ears, and I try to develop a little rhythm through listening to records."

Mrs. Jones' classes say the flag salute each day, and sing their "theme" song, "This Land is Your Land." The questions come in fast succession, and the students are eager to out-do each other when answering.

Mrs. Jones teaches two classes of students. One in the morning is comprised mostly of students who ride the bus in the morning. The afternoon class consists of town kids.

"I have to give a lot of credit to the mothers," Mrs. Jones said. "They really work hard to keep the kindergarten running." There is no connection between the school and the kindergarten—it is privately funded by the $15.00 which is paid for each student each month. "The rummage sales held twice a year keep us going. That is the only place we get money to buy things." Something new is added to the kindergarten each year. "This year it was a record player and a tape recorder. When I first came here, there was hardly anything here. Now, through the mothers' hard work, we have quite a bit of stuff, which is really good."
