In the first game a three run homer by Rick Drake kept the Mustangs even with Condon at the end of 7 innings. It wasn't until the ninth, when Dale Hedman connected with a triple and scored on a wild pitch, that the home team finally wrapped it up. Jerry Gentry was winning pitcher.

The Navy Advanced Electronics Field Program

Why is there an Advanced Electronic Field Program? Today, its an electronic Navy. Sometimes it seems like computers are the real brass. And electronic beams are as indispensable as the old sextant used to be. So the Navy has established its Advanced Electronics Field Program. This is a comprehensive enlistment that introduces high school graduates to the whole sophisticated world of advanced electronics. It trains them to eventually become the minds behind the operation and maintenance of all the Navy's electronic equipment.

What can it do for you personally? It can give you a sophisticated, respected education in electronics. And then it can give you the opportunity to put your education to work. In short, the Advanced Electronics Field Program offers you a chance to become a man of electronics whether you've gone to college or not.

How long do you serve? Six years. Two years longer than the usual enlistment, simply because the Advanced Electronics Field Program has a lot more to teach you than the usual enlistment. There's a lot of technical training, and a lot of serious studying on your part. All this takes time. And after your training's over, there's still enough time left to build up important electronic experience that will be helpful later, either with the Navy or in your civilian career.

Ione Auction Crew Working 'On The Double'

The telephone at the Keith Rea home has been very busy recently. Chances are it will continue to be so until after June 2nd, the day of the Ione Auction and Barbecue. Mr. and Mrs. Rea, general co-chairmen, coordinate the activities of 15 committees and 6 sub-committees so that they function as one. This, they say, requires a lot of time on the phone and they are grateful they have an understanding neighbor on their two-party line.

Mrs. Keith Rea, general co-chairman of the Ione Auction - Barbecue spends much time on the telephone these days. Getting to be real professionals at answering the phone are four year old Christopher and 3 year old Gary.
