Joseph Cox Appointed Director of Extension

A long-time Oregon Extension educator, Joseph R. Cox, has been appointed associate dean of the School of Agriculture and director of the Oregon State University Extension Service.

Cox, 56, assumes his new duties immediately, according to Wilbur T. Cooney, dean of agriculture.

Cox succeeds Lee R. Kolmer, who left Oregon State in March to become dean of agriculture at Iowa State University. Cox has been associate director of Extension since 1971 when Kolmer became director.

The Oregon State University Extension Service is the university's statewide arm for educational programs in agriculture, forestry, home economics, community development, marine resources, and 4-H youth education.

The U. S. Department of State last year named Cox as consultant on Extension programs for the government of Turkey. As consultant, he has helped the Turkish government adopt and apply Extension educational techniques.

The new director received a bachelor's degree from Oregon State in 1939 and master's degree from Pacific University in 1963. He did additional graduate study at George Washington University, University of Arizona, and the University of Oregon.

Extension "extends" through informal teaching programs the work and research findings of the university and other sources into every county and community of the state, Cooney noted. A network of county Extension agents is backed up by a staff of specialists in a variety of subjects.

Although service to agriculture has been a vital role of Extension since its beginning, new educational roles have been added in recent years. Extension has undertaken a series of new programs serving all areas of Oregon--rural and urban--that are designed to help the state develop all of its resources.

Besides agriculture, major program thrusts are conducted in forestry, marine resources and community development. Development of human resources is fostered through education in family living and 4-H and youth. 4-H has more than 40,000 members in Oregon.
