ASCS officials tour the area

A group from the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service made a tour of projects in this area Tuesday.

The tour was led by Dave McLeod of the local office. E. Rank, Northwest area director for ASCS; Steve Wade and H. Smith, information directors for ASCS, Washington; Robert Jepsen, state committee chairman, and Donald Thompson of Moro, Glenn Broggiotti of Umatilla County and Sherwood Nicholas, state ASCS executive director, Portland, spent the day viewing ing erosion and flood control projects in Shobe Canyon and the developments in the north end of the county.

The tour began at Boardman at 9 a.m., with stops at the new irrigation pumping station, Desert Magic and Sabre Farms and back to Heppner for lunch.

In the afternoon they visited Shobe Canyon, with special attention to the Melvin Moyer and John Ledbetter places; the Blackhorse project and to Lexington where the tour ended.

Fire equipment is available to farms

The fire season is here and county-owned fire equipment has been made available.

The following numbers may be called for emergency equipment: Terry Thompson, 676-9770; Darold Hams, 676-5320; Jerry Brosnan, 676-5327; Don Heliker, 422-7160; Roy Martin, 989-8487; Harold Wright, 676-5310; Ken Peck, 989-8151; Jack Sumner, 676-5364; and Bob Rietmann, 422-7120.

Extension Agent Mike Howell urges farmers to post these telephone numbers in a prominent place in the home, and that a telephone network be developed in all communities so that help can be readily available.

Howell suggests that fire prevention safeguards be made by all farmers:

Get rid of dead grass and weeds in a 10-foot area around all buildings;

Plow fire breaks around all fields and divide larger fields with fire breaks;

Put hay stacks far apart and away from buildings;

Have water cans and sacks on combines and in buildings.

Each year the county and the county extension office places equipment in strategic locations to assist farmers in fighting fires.

Squirrels worry ranchers

Eastern Oregon is facing a population explosion—in ground squirrels.

"Ranchers are concerned about their forage and cereal grain crops being converted into squirrel meat instead of beef," said B.J. Verts, Oregon State University wildlife ecologist.

As a result, two OSU Agricultural Experiment Station projects—one to evaluate various control techniques, and another to learn more about the squirrel—are getting under way under the direction of Verts.

The culprit is Belding's ground squirrel. It ranges over most of Oregon east of the Cascade Mountains and prefers moist areas at lower altitudes than preferred by most other ground squirrel species, thereby coming into conflict with agriculture.

"The ground squirrel population appears to be increasing and is prompting increased complaints from ranchers," said Verts.

The rodents are active in the spring and summer, waking up with huge appetites after several months of dormancy.

They come out of dormancy from about Feb. 1 to April 1, depending on altitude, breed almost immediately, and produce eight or nine offspring after a short gestation period. The young must reach adult size and store enough energy for the coming dormant period by mid-July or mid-August.

"They are really eating machines during their five months or so of activity, damaging forage and small grain crops," said Verts.

Recommended controls, principally poisoned baits, have not been effective, he added.
