

Quarreling seagulls along the Columbia River.

Lexington

A roundtable discussion was held at Lexington Grange Monday night, with Harold Kerr as moderator. Reports were given on such grains as Row, Paha and others and their resistance to disease and weather conditions explored. Talks were given on outcystematode and other pests, and how to combat it by soil fumigation or by planting disease-resistant grain varieties. It was reported that cottonwood trees are dying in the county, and it was suggested that hybrid poplar be planted in their place. Weed and pest controls such as Amaryl T, Kurb and 2-4-D were discussed.
