'The Sound of Coaches' is high adventure

Leon Garfield, a contemporary British novelist, has been successful with novels which appeal to young adults. His 1974 book club choice, "The Sound of Coaches," was reviewed for the Bookworms on March 11 by Helen Currin. "Once upon a winter's night when the wind blew its guts out and a fishy piece of moon scuttled among the clouds, a coach came thundering down the long hill outside of Dorking."

So begins this raffish adventure laid in 18th century England that tells of a founding lad and his legacy, a traveling company of players, and as original a set of heroes, villains, and waspish characters to appear since "The Beggar's Opera."

This literate and well-crafted romance tells of a rugged old coachman and his even more rugged wife who rides shotgun on The Flying Cradle, the Chichester-London coach. Sam, their adopted son, who struggles to discover his origins; Jenny, the London chambermaid who loves Sam and who is determined to "keep herself clean"; and one Daniel Coventry, actor and supreme egotist. Amidst this startling cast, young Sam weaves fantasies about his lineage, a pistol and a ring, and the unknown father to whom they once belonged. Had he been a daring highwayman, who was hanged? Or was he a noble, dashing hero, a fit father for Sam to admire?

In a series of dramatic climaxes, continually and hilariously manipulated by fate, Sam is finally able to realize that his own nature is more important than that of his parentage. A happy blend of poignant comedy and skilful plotting makes this book appealing.

Mrs. Currin pointed out that this book is in the Heppner Library. This meeting was in the Weatherford home.

"Daughter" was voted the best dressed girl in college!
