First aid deadline delayed

Many Oregon employers are scurrying to train employees in first aid to meet upcoming state safety regulations effective June 1.

Under the new regulations set by the Occupational Health Section of the Oregon Health Division, at least one person per job site must have a first aid card. The regulations exempt sole employees and those job sites less than four minutes from a medical facility.

First aid training is available for all employers insured by the State Accident Insurance Fund (SAIF). The fund insures the majority of businesses in the state. Employers not insured with SAIF should be certain that instruction is by an accredited first aid instructor using the approved Red Cross (or equivalent) class.

The original March 1 deadline for first aid was set back two months as qualified first aid instructors throughout the state were swamped with employer requests. Other factors influencing the rollback were complaints from numerous employers and employer groups concerning details about the regulations.

Time for rerecording livestock brand past

Persons using livestock brands that were not rerecorded with the Oregon Department of Agriculture between July 1, 1974 and January 1, 1975, are reminded by the department that the brands are expired.

This means that the brand, if it does not conflict with existing recorded brands, is available for issuing to new applicants.

Wilma Russell, administrative assistant in charge of brand recording with the department's Livestock Identification Program, said some 19,000 applications for rerecording of brands were mailed by the department. Approximately 5,000 of these were not returned and are considered expired.

She said it is imperative that persons who have overlooked rerecording their livestock brand contact the State Department of Agriculture at the Agriculture Building, Salem, OR 97310 at once to reinstate their brands if they plan to continue using them.
