Receipts are expected to increase dramatically in the future.

The adjoining map shows the areas currently in question and outlines the management priorities assigned by the Forest Service in the Heppner Planning Unit. The current policy demanded by the Forest Service stipulates that the primary concern for many areas is maintenance of elk habitat, with timber production as a secondary concern. Thus, existing in current policy of the area is an inherent constraint on timber sales and production by the elk herd. This is not a temporary policy adopted by the Forest Service, rather, it serves as a long-range mandate for area management.

Public law, both state and federal, contain numerous provisions for comprehensive environmental standards in multiple use land. Although multiple use activities do affect the soil, soil productivity is required by law to be maintained. All activities in multiple use managed areas must meet existing State and Federal water quality standards. Though this existing mechanism, both elk and fishery habitat will be maintained.

Multiple use designation does not mean that the forest lands in the Heppner Unit will be clear cut and destroyed.

Present techniques have progressed and matured to state where areas that are now designated for multiple use can effectively produce timber and other resources, maintain fish and wildlife habitat while providing access to recreation opportunities for all people.

What people fail to realize is that much of the scenic timber lands they look at are already in full commodity production. Rather than altering land form appearance, resource management produces amenities desired by many of us including increases in water supply and certain wildlife specie.
