

Corps undertakes environmental review

An Environmental Review of Water Withdrawals in the Columbia River Basin has been undertaken by the Army Corps of Engineers, the agency announced this week. Effects on fish, wildlife, navigation, recreation, and power resulting from withdrawing waters from the rivers and reservoirs of the Columbia Basin are being studied according to Colonel Terence J. Connell, Portland District engineer. "In the past, the waters of the Columbia River were seen as an unlimited resource," Colonel Connell said. "But with the growth of the region's population and economy it has become apparent that there will not always be enough water to meet the needs of all users." When complete, the study will provide a central source of information about water withdrawal throughout the Columbia Basin. It will be used by the Corps of Engineers in its permit program, and it will be a source document and reference for federal, state, regional and local resource planning agencies and other interested groups. Since withdrawals for irrigation are the largest by volume, they will be a major focus of this environmental review. Anyone interested in commenting on the environmental review of receiving information as the study progresses should write to Study Manager, Environmental Review, Portland District, U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, P.O. Box 2946, Portland, Oregon 97208.
