

Mule deer diminished but hunting for other big game looks good

The outlook for the hunting seasons this fall is going to vary depending on the species of game you hunt. If you hunt mule deer, expect to find your opportunities diminished. But if upland game is your sport the outlook is much improved. Prospects for elk, black-tailed deer, other big game and waterfowl may be pretty much on par with last year.

A severe winter in parts of eastern Oregon this last year has reduced populations of younger age-class mule deer in many areas, and even though there was a generally good carry-over of older bucks, hunters will find their prospects reduced in many units. A 12-day mule deer season beginning September 29 is again on tap this year except in 11 management units where it will be only seven days long.

A 4-point buck regulation applies only to Steens Unit and the southwest one quarter of Whitehorse Unit this year and a special permit is required to hunt there. Permits were issued first come, first served, and no more are available.

Black-tailed deer populations are in generally good shape, and long seasons have again been set for western Oregon. In the northwest part of the state hunters will again have a five-day either-sex season at the end of the general buck season. In southwestern Oregon that system was replaced this year with controlled management unit permits valid only in conjunction with an unused black-tailed deer tag to take an antlerless animal.

Elk herds are generally stable throughout the state although some reduction in productivity was seen in a few units, and a few areas there were also some winter losses of calves. In western Oregon, mainly on the west slopes of the Cascades and central Coast Range, small herds are gradually expanding and providing additional new hunting opportunities.

Heavy hunting pressure on the opening weekend continued to be a problem in more popular units last year, and a regulation was adopted for this season which splits the elk season for both Rocky Mountain and Roosevelt elk. In eastern Oregon the first season runs October 27 through 31, and the second period is November 3 through 11. In western Oregon dates are November 10 through 13 and November 17 through 23. The hunter chooses one period when he buys his tag and his hunting is limited to that period.

In western Oregon three-point bull regulations will again be in effect in Saddle Mountain and Tioga units and hunters in those units must have a permit which restricts them to one unit or the other. There is no limit on the numbers of permits available. Chetco and Dixon units are also under a 3-point rule but anyone with a valid Roosevelt elk tag can hunt in these units.

On the east side, the Chesnimnus Unit is restricted to 3,000 permit holders again this year, and Snake River is restricted to 1,000 permit holders and a 3-point bull regulation remains in effect.

Hunters are reminded that the sale of deer and elk tags will end again this year before the general season begins. No deer tags will be sold after September 28, no Rocky Mountain elk tags after October 26, and no Roosevelt elk tags after November 9. Bear tag sales ended August 31, the day before the general season opened.

Vehicle restrictions will again be in effect in many parts of the state. In these closure areas a few main roads remain open to provide access, but side roads are closed and all off-road vehicle use is prohibited. Road closures are generally applied in areas where excessive road construction, usually for forest management purposes, has left game herds too vulnerable. They have been widely accepted by the hunting public, and they are all listed along with their effective dates in the game mammal synopsis.

Beverly Wilson was low gross winner in Tuesday's Ladies play. Roxie Lovgren turned in the second low gross and Judy Stevens had least putts.

Rule changes for school lunches

Under a new Department of Agriculture rule, schools now have the option of sending parents eligibility information only for reduced price meals served in the school lunch and breakfast programs.

Previously, schools were required to send notices to parents giving income and family size criteria for both free meals and reduced price meals.
