

Morrow schools aid "Child Find" —for the handicapped

Found: In Multnomah County, a four-year-old boy who was thought to be mentally retarded. He was placed in a preschool for multihandicapped children where it was determined that he was not retarded. He progressed to such an extent that he was enrolled in a regular classroom program and is doing very well in school.

Found: In Klamath County, an 18-month-old child who because of a birth defect had very poor hearing and no speech. He is now receiving speech therapy and to the delight of his parents, is learning to talk.

These two children are now getting the help they need, but there are still many children in Oregon who have special problems and whose educational needs are not being met. They are pre-schoolers who are not developing the way they should be; they are school-age children, sitting in classrooms unable to learn; they are teenagers who dropped out of school in frustration and anger at their inability to succeed. They are all children, birth to 21 years of age, who cannot succeed in school because of a physical, mental, emotional or learning problem which is interfering with their education. School districts around the state are extremely concerned about these children, but they can do nothing to help them until they are found.

Child Find, a State Department of Education project, is helping school districts find these children. "Parents with handicapped children often don't know where to turn for help," said Mary Anne Stowell, State Director of Child Find. "Because of this, their children's educational needs often go unmet."

Parents or guardians who believe their child may have physical, mental, emotional or learning problems may call the project's toll-free number in Portland for additional information. The number is 1-800-452-7727.

Morrow County School Superintendent Matt Doherty said the school district does participate in the Child Find program. He said any local people who need help may call him at the school district office in Lexington at 989-8123. Those contacting the project will receive information on the services Child Find can provide. Subsequently, they may request, through the project, that their child undergo appropriate testing in their local school district. All information about individual children referred to the project will be kept confidential.

Stowell explains that it is the responsibility of the local school district to follow up the Child Find referral by providing for diagnostic testing of the child, and when required, suitable special programming.
