

Regulations governing BLM grazing lands have been amended

Grazing regulations for lands managed by the Bureau of Land Management have been amended to incorporate provisions of the Public Rangelands Improvement Act.

The amendments change regulations for grazing preferences, length of permits, and location of lands in exchange-of-use agreements. They affect about 13.6 million acres of rangeland managed by BLM in Oregon and 218,000 acres in Washington.

If grazing reductions become necessary, the livestock operator's grazing preference will be suspended rather than cancelled. That way, when range conditions are improved, the livestock operator can share in the increased forage. Generally, grazing permits are for 10 years. The adopted amendment specifies that the absence of a completed land-use plan shall not be the sole basis for issuing a grazing permit for a term of less than 10 years.

Under the amended regulations, in certain situations private lands in exchange-of-use agreements can be located outside of the BLM allotment. This change covers agreements already existing or where such an agreement helps promote management objectives, according to Reg Ross, BLM grazing administration specialist.

Several sections of the proposed amendment concerning placing grazing decisions in full force and effect were deleted from the final rulemaking in light of public comments and recent legislation.

All adopted amendments were published as proposed rulemaking in the "Federal Register" on July 30, 1979, followed by a 60-day public comment period. Final regulations become effective on August 11.

Library Program comes to a close

The Lone Elementary School Summer Library program, in cooperation with the Lone City Library and the AAUW, held their closing program at 2 p.m. on July 29, at the United Church of Christ basement in Lone.

The Rev. Cathy Barker entertained with a musical program.

The following special awards were given to those who participated in the special events available.

Fans promised good racing at Ore. State Fair

"Horse racing fans not only are promised a better racing meet than ever before at the 1980 Oregon State Fair, August 23 to September 1, but will have a better view of the races," according to Fair Director Dwight Butt.

"We will have a bigger purse schedule than ever before," Butt said, "and we expect to attract the best and fastest horses in the history of the fair. Improvements in the facilities include removing the judging stand from the apron, opening up a better view of the back stretch and finish line for spectators," he said. The judging stand is now suspended from the roof of the grandstand. This also gives the judges a better view of the race.

"Other improvements at the track," according to Racing Director Al Lightner, "include a direct phone line from the finish line stewards to the judges stand, improvement in the video-taping equipment, and a new paddock with two more stalls than in past years."

"It looks like an exciting year for the State Fair racing meet and for the Lone Oak racing meet that follows the Fair on Fridays, Saturdays, and Sundays through mid-October," Lightner said.
