

The Heppner Gazette-Times, Heppner, Oregon, Thursday, October 30, 1980—SEVENTEEN

"Fossils are great teaching aids," says Ruben. "They fascinate students—especially

He used funds from that grant, not only to collect fossils-on a permanent loan basis from the Park Service-for use in his undergraduate

"Other places have fossils, but they're bits and pieces of time. At John Day, on the other hand, we have one period—from 32 million years

"The reason the monument was established in 1975 was for the protection and scientific interpretation of the fossil

The zoology department has already presented the Park Service with three "very good" specimens—a rare fossilized turtle and two fossil oreodonts (an extinct animal

"We want students and visitors to see what fossils look like when they're still in the ground. We also want to set up, in about one year's time, a program supported in part by OSU and the Park Service where graduate students can conduct actual research at the Fossil Beds and publish their results," he adds.

By an overwhelming majority, Americans feel that the future benefits to society from technological advances outweigh the risks, and that the development of advanced technology ought to continue in an uninhibited a regulatory environment as reasonably possible.

These surprising conclusions come out of a landmark study of attitudes, "Risk in a Complex Society," conducted by Louis Harris Associates for Marsh & McLennan, Incorporated, the world's largest insurance broker.

The survey, based on more than two thousand interviews with the public, business executives and federal officials, also shows that a plurality of the public feel people should be allowed to decide for themselves whether or not to use food products linked to cancer such as nitrites and saccharin.
