Anglers asked to save steelhead scales

The efforts of volunteer anglers last year who helped collect steelhead scales resulted in 1,526 samples representing fish from 48 streams in Oregon. The Fish and Wildlife Department's research and development section is in the process of analyzing these scales now. But Research Biologist Nancy MacHugh says even more scales are needed.

The scale sampling is part of a continuing project to try to determine the percentage of wild versus hatchery steelhead in Oregon's rivers. From the scales biologists can tell whether a steelhead originated from a hatchery or whether it was instead hatched and reared in the stream. Fish scales have circular growth rings like those found on the cross-section of a tree. The innermost rings of the scales of a hatchery fish are uniform due to the regular availability of food in the hatchery during the one year rearing period prior to release. Scales from wild steelhead show uneven growth rings as well as distinct winter growth checks during the two to three years they rear in fresh water before migrating to the ocean, the department said.

By "reading" scales from angler-caught steelhead on special equipment, biologists will be able to determine the percentage of hatchery vs. wild adult steelhead caught from various streams.

A sufficiently large sample size (about 200 per stream) is needed to enable reasonable estimates of the wild to hatchery ratio. Last year only four of the 48 streams from which scales were received were represented by more than 100 samples. The department would like to obtain this data from all steelhead streams in the state. So once again the assistance of volunteers is needed. Samples from both summer and winter run fish in all streams are needed, the department stressed.

In addition to the wild to hatchery ratio, scales turned in by anglers throughout the year provide information on the area and time of season in which wild fish are caught, what rivers have high or low catches of wild fish, what effect stocking location and number of fish stocked has on the catch of hatchery fish, and the success of out-system releases (where stocks from one river system are reared to migration size and released in a different river system.)

Anglers willing to participate in the program can obtain special scale envelopes from local Northwest Steelheaders chapters, from many river guides or from the Department of Fish and Wildlife (write ODFW, Research Section, P.O. Box 1628, Corvallis, OR 97330). A pamphlet on the Salmon and Trout Enhancement Program's scale collection project is also available from these sources. Local anglers can either turn in their collected scales to the above address or to Glen Ward in Heppner.

At least eight or ten scales should be taken from each fish immediately above the lateral line and below the dorsal fin. This is where the scales first form on juvenile fish and scales from this area contain the most information. Scales taken from other areas often do not contain enough information to enable separating hatchery from wild fish.

Scales should not be taken from any fish intended for release as this opens the door for bacterial infection and reduces the chances for survival, the department said.

Scales are most easily removed by scraping them off with a knife blade. The scales from a single fish should be wiped from the blade on a piece of paper and the paper placed into a scale envelope or ordinary envelope on which should be marked the stream where caught, date, sex of fish, length, and any fin marks. The envelopes should be turned in as soon as possible to any of the envelope sources previously listed.

In order for the effort to be successful, samples from many fish and from all streams need to be obtained. This means the cooperation of a large number of anglers is needed. Of equal importance is that a large percentage of salmon-steelhead "punch-cards" also be returned so that the catch estimates for each stream will be as accurate as possible. Therefore, anglers are urged to turn in the 1982 salmon-steelhead card as soon as possible. It expired December 31 and a new card and angling license is needed for 1983.

The cooperative scale collection program is an opportunity for steelhead anglers to use their fish-catching skills to benefit long-range management of the resource, the department said.
