'Ultimate low calorie sweetner' available

What may be the ultimate low-calorie sweetener is finally on the market. The product is called aspartame (marketed under the brand name Equal) and it is up to 200 times sweeter than sucrose, common table sugar, said Joan Weiner, Oregon State University Extension foods and nutrition specialist.

Because aspartame is so much sweeter than table sugar, the average daily sweetener intake for a person using only aspartame would probably not exceed one gram or four calories.

"Aspartame is made by combining the two amino acids, phenylalanine and aspartic acid," Weiner explained. "Aspartame is digested as a protein and the two amino acids are metabolized like any such acid naturally occurring in foods."

As good as aspartame sounds, it does have some limitations. For instance, heating aspartame to boiling temperature or above causes its component amino acids to separate, which in turn causes the sweetener to lose its sweet taste.

An additional drawback is that aspartame has a limited shelf life in food products containing water, such as soft drinks. In acidic water solutions aspartame separates into its amino acid components, losing all its sweet flavor within 60 to 90 days, depending on the refrigerated storage temperature.

Aspartame has been approved for use by diabetics desiring sweeteners that do not affect their insulin levels, Weiner said. On the other hand, persons with PKU, (phenylketonuria), a rare genetic disease, should avoid aspartame sweetened products, she explained.

"This is because individuals suffering from PKU have a low tolerance for phenylalanine, one of aspartame's constituent amino acids," Weiner said.
