Local woman aboard plane diverted by bomb scare

Wavel Wilkinson of Heppner, her daughter Frances, and son-in-law Walter Oslund from Denver were among 433 people on a flight from San Francisco to Honolulu which was diverted to a Colorado Springs airport where it landed safely following a bomb threat.

According to an account in a Colorado Springs newspaper, an anonymous caller had demanded $50,000 in small, unmarked bills in exchange for telling the airline how to disengage the pressure-sensitive device which would activate once the plane reached 4,500 ft. and would then explode when the plane descended to 6,000 feet when approaching a landing in Hawaii. The account concludes "The Colorado Springs airport is about 6,200 feet above sea level. Planes are usually diverted there or to Denver's airport, also more than a mile high, when threats of altitude-sensitive bombs are received."

Wilkinson continues her story, "We were to have been taken by bus from Colorado Springs to Denver, 50 miles to another plane. In the meantime a blizzard had dumped 18 inches of snow in the area and closed the road, also Denver airport."

"In due time a plane arrived from Denver, picked us up and landed in Honolulu 14 hours late."
