Livestock producers rewarded for time at animal program

By STEVE CAMPBELL
Morrow County Extension Agent
 The Oregon State University Extension Service and the Morrow County Livestock Growers Association cooperated on a Livestock Health program Wednesday, January 23, 1985. Dr. Nordan Stefanides of the Hermiston Veterinary Clinic was the featured speaker and spent one and one-half hours presenting information he had prepared and in answering questions posed by individual producers. Thirty-one Morrow County livestock producers were in attendance at the meeting and were well rewarded for their time. Dwight Bailey, president of the Morrow County Livestock Growers, conducted the meeting.

The primary topic of discussion was tricomoniiasis, a livestock venereal disease that causes first trimester abortions, and in some cases sterility, in cows. It is an old established disease that hasn't been a problem locally for many years. That changed this fall when several local herds were diagnosed with tricomoniiasis or were exposed to herds that were diagnosed as having tricomoniiasis.

Additionally, Dr. Stefanides discussed other livestock health problems of a more common nature and the associated health care practices that producers need to implement to avoid them. Specifically, he discussed the options for insecticide ear tags, internal and external parasite control, growth implants for calves, heifers, and steers, and health problems associated with turnip pastures. The costs of various drugs that are available were covered as were the timing for inoculations and treatment of common diseases.

In addition to cattle health problems certain sheep problems were discussed. Foot-vax and Ivomectin were covered and the costs versus the benefits of each compared. Selected drugs and treatment schedules for sheep diseases and disorders were the final topics of the evening.
