What's Your Opinion?

Question: "Do you feel the Police action taken in Philadelphia following the MOVE barricade to resist eviction was justified?"

"No," said Sandy James of Heppner. "I think they could have found a better means of eviction so others wouldn't have been hurt."

Warns about poison hemlock

Poison hemlock is a serious threat to everyone in Morrow County, says Bob Costa, Oregon State University Extension Agent for Morrow County.

Curious children often put pieces of the plant in their mouths. Illness and even death can result from eating poison hemlock. Even handling the plant can cause sickness because the poison is absorbed through the skin.

Poison hemlock is found throughout central Morrow County and is a very common within the city limits of Heppner, Lexington, and Ione. The plant is most common along creeks, but can be found just about anywhere. The plant often grows as a weed in home yards.

Everyone in the area should know how to recognize poison hemlock. All children should be taught to recognize the plant and know its dangers, continues Costa.

Poison hemlock resembles wild carrot. The leaves are dark green and the plant can be from one to 12 feet tall. The stem is smooth with purple spots.

Anyone having plants suspected of being poison hemlock, should contact the Morrow County Weed Control Supervisor (676-5432) or the OSU Extension Office in Heppner (676-9642) for help identifying the weed.

Poison hemlock plants should be dug-up or sprayed. "Dispose of plants carefully so they do not pose a threat to children or animals," says Costa. Contact the OSU Extension Office in Heppner for more information.

Wear gloves and long sleeves if you handle poison hemlock because the poison is absorbed through your skin," warns Costa. "Many people have become ill from pulling-up poison hemlock patches with bare hands and arms."
