"WEATHER FACTS"

By John Walls, KOIN-TV Newsroom 6
Chief Meteorologist

PACIFIC NORTHWEST: A CLIMATIC POTPOURRI

The Pacific Ocean has a major influence on the weather in the Northwest, particularly in the coastal zones and in other areas west of the Cascade Range. The predominant west to east movement of weather at our latitudes provides ocean air that is moist and comparatively warm during the winter and cool in the summer. As a result, the annual climate is classified as "mild."

The Cascade Range acts as a large fence often preventing the ocean air from moving into the eastern sections of Washington and Oregon. Thus, the weather on the east side of the mountains is frequently the result of the intrusion of Canadian air or air from the desert southwest. Both of these air masses are cold or cool during the winter and hot or warm in the summer but relatively dry during the entire year.

Occasionally, during the summer, warm and moist air from off of Baja, California will make its way northward through California to the Northwest. This air mass provides both sides of the Cascades with the right combination of heat and moisture to produce thunderstorms and generally "sticky" weather.

Restrictions in the movement of the various air masses due to terrain features, are largely responsible for the variety of climates found in the Pacific Northwest. Over relatively short distances, we find the cool, moist air of the marine climate close to the coast, the dry desert air of the eastern basins, the cool alpine air of the Cascades, and the mild valley air typical of the Willamette Valley. Few areas in the country have such a variety of climates.
