Save young wildlife; don't pick them up

Every year about this time, information offices of wildlife agencies around the United States put out the same basic news release. It appeals to state residents not to pick up young wildlife.

This annual plea has been issued each spring and early summer for decades. And still, every year, people do not seem to get the message, says the Oregon Dept. of Fish and piece of clothing. "What I did was actually test that statement at the point of purchase and with a garment bought for the consumer's own use, Gipson said.

Her study is the first to couch the "country of origin" question among a variety of other factors to avoid bias in the survey. She even drew the 16 factors out of a hat to avoid any bias in the order they were listed on the survey form.

After arranging with department and discount store managers in Portland, Gresham, Jantzen Beach, Veaverton, Tualatin and Hillsboro, Gipson approached customers who had just bought women's sweaters and asked them to participate.

While they filled out the survey forms, Gipson examined the garments, quietly noting the country of origin on the label.

On the second page of the survey, after the "importance of purchase" questions were answered, Gipson asked whether the garment was made in the United States or a foreign country. Eighty-three percent of the respondents either did not know or gave the wrong answer, just minutes after buying the garment.

Fit, color, coordination with existing wardrobe, style and quality of construction were the most significant factors customers gave for buying the sweaters they did. Those factors scored an average of more than six points on the survey's scale of 1 to 7.

Expected durability, warmth or coolness properties, ease of care, price, fiber content, fashion and feel averaged between 4 and 6 points.

The store where the purchase was made rated a 3.4 average; designer label or name brand a 2.51; and, finally, the country of origin a 2.40, Gipson said.

Her survey found a slight tendency among older shoppers to place more importance on a garment's country of origin when buying a sweater. But with respect to household income, occupation and education, "there was no significant difference."

Of the 181 sweaters purchased by the respondents in Gipson's survey, 68 were manufactured in the United States and 113 in foreign countries. A greater proportion of domestic sweaters were purchased at discount stores (60 percent) compared with department stores (30 percent). The average price paid in the discount stores was $9, while in the department stores it was $23.

Gipson said she could not tell from her survey if the U.S. apparel manufacturers' "Buy American" advertising campaign is having any effect on consumer buying habits because she did not measure their awareness level before the survey for fear of biasing the results.

Gipson earned her bachelor's degree in child development and family life from OSU in 1974. When she completes her master's degree, she hopes to get a job in clothing manufacturing.

Wildlife

Deer fawns are the most common target of people who think they are saving an orphaned animal. But the list of animals caught up by human good intentions does not stop there.

Biologists with the Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife also get calls from concerned citizens who have picked up young cougars, bobcats, beaver, seals and even bears.

The irony of the situation is that removing these animals from the wild poses a far greater threat to their well-being than simply leaving them alone. In most cases, the mother is nearby either feeding, or simply unwilling to show herself when humans are around.

Bill Hines, department wildlife biologist at Coos Bay, says he gets about seven fawns every year, plus a variety of other wildlife species.

"It's the same every year. The fawns are normally born during the first two weeks of June. Usually by that second week, the calls start coming in. This year it seems to be happening earlier. I started getting calls by the end of May," he said.

Hines says he frequently does not hear about a fawn until the people who picked it up have had the animal for a week or so.

"They will keep it for a while—handle it, play around and feed it—until it gets sick or starts getting too rambunctious. Then they call me to come get it," says Hines.

Occasionally, he is informed soon after the animal is taken out of the woods. "I tell them to take it right back to the same spot, and then get out of there. Sometimes the mother will come back," he said.

Human disturbance is not good for the animals. Many captive fawns will sicken and possibly die because strange foods upset their systems, causing often fatal cases of diarrhea. The ones that do survive will often be too tame or incapable of caring for themselves to survive well back in the wild.

Picking up animals is not good for humans either. Taking and keeping these wild animals in captivity is against the law. People can be fined. Also, wildlife biologists have common stories of crying children and upset parents when the animal is ultimately taken away.

"It is not a good situation, especially since it is one that could have been avoided," says Hines.
