Jewel Wise AGS
Jewelry Fashions, Facts, Fiction

ON THE SIDE OF THE LAW
Here's a not-so-trivial pursuit question...must gold be either karat marked (such as 14K or 18K) or trademarked? Stamping gold jewelry with a karat mark is not required by law. If gold is stamped with a karat mark, however, then the law requires that it must also carry a trademark stamp. Protecting you, the consumer, is the reason for both laws. If you buy unstamped gold jewelry you have opted to take your chances about the actual gold content in the piece. But the law can protect you if you believe you are buying karat gold because the piece is stamped 14K or 18K. The protection can only be offered, however, if the piece is also trademarked. A trademark stamp lets everyone know who made your ring or necklace. If you have the jewelry piece appraised and you learn the gold content is less than the karat stamp shows, you know which manufacturer wronged you. If there is no trademark stamp, however, the manufacturer cannot be proved and you may have learned a hard lesson of "buyer beware." Because our jewelry is selected with you in mind, we check to be sure that gold jewelry really is the quality you want and that the manufacturer is willing to stand behind the product. Our concern for your protection is the reason we are an American Gem Society firm.
