A JACOB Sheep

Sam and Matthew help their mother Sandra hold their new Jacob sheep.

Sandra and Dan Van Liew, Heppner, have at last purchased a sheep they have been trying to locate for over two years. They purchased their "Jacob" sheep from a woman in Idaho.

The sheep, a primitive breed, originally from England, is six months old and will be quite a bit larger, explains Sandra. Their sheep has four horns, but can have any amount from two on, preferably an even number, and can even have them on their forehead. These sheep use their horns like clubs. This particular breed is a very hardy animal, particularly resistant to foot rot and very friendly.

Sandra spins her own wool for her specific use, and is anxious to shear her sheep in the spring. Although the "Jacob" doesn't produce as much wool as our sheep, as it is smaller, the fleece is noted for its softness. In England you can get sweaters specifically made from "Jacob" fleece, even though they have become almost extinct there. Spinners like this wool very much, because of the two colors of fleece.

Although these animals are not expensive, Sandra says she got a good deal on hers.
