There It Is Again

I saw it again this morning. I knew it was coming before I actually saw it. It was time. I saw the faintest pale yellow halo far in the distance at first. Then it got more intense the closer it came. The aura got darker, nearly orange as it got closer. I could feel the excitement build. I've seen it before of course, but each time is like the first. I'm literally awe-stricken.

Then there it was, the first little bit peeking over a cloud, bright orange and you could tell from that bare silver it was huge. For an instant the birds were silent, the breeze was still, the whole world seemed to stop to watch. My very soul warmed, my heart filled with hope and my mind reeled with the magnitude of it all.

In only seconds it was fully in view, round, bright, warm. The past was gone the future was now, a new day. Desert Sunrise!

I think I see the sunset so often that I've become jaded. But the sunrise, particularly a sunrise in Morrow County, where you can see forever, is a thrill to me even now that haying season is here and I see it nearly every morning.

I made a batch of wine one time that I named Desert Sunrise. It was the right red/orange color and it tasted like I thought a sunrise would. I guess that's my nature, to look more to the new day upcoming than to dwell on the past. We can't do much about the past, except learn from it and then apply that lesson to the new day. The new hope, the new dream.

As I see it, without the new time around, there wasn't much point in the last time around. Life is but an unending series of opportunities to do a little better, a little better than the next guy or a little better than I've done before. So long as life goes on, I will be looking for that opportunity to do a little better, and will be thrilled by another Desert Sunrise.

AS I SEE IT
