Ione students send pictures to children in Armenia hospitals

The Ione Elementary school students sent pictures they drew to Armenia recently. The Jonathan Nicholas column in the Oregonian mentioned that Debbie Kennedy, a Portland nurse, felt pictures would help cheer children who are in Armenian hospitals after the devastating December earthquake. The Oregonian offered to collect and distribute pictures by school children.

Students researched information on Armenia and about earthquakes. Sue Proudfoot showed slides and talked to the students about her trip to Armenia. She also showed items she had brought back from the U.S.S.R. and explained about the various cultures there.

After the project everyone felt they knew more about Armenia and were glad they were able to share their pictures as a sign of friendship to the children of Armenia.
