Letters to the Editor

To the Editor:

I would like you to consider printing the following report in your publication. I realize this is a lengthy letter, but our organization believes it is important that we all work together in resolving the problem of the spotted owl and old-growth timber harvests in Oregon.

It has become obvious to many citizens that the controversies surrounding the spotted owl and the preservation versus harvesting of old-growth forests have gone beyond reason. The polarization of attitudes is costing members of environmental and timber industry groups enormous sums of money for publicity, injunctions, and lawsuits. It is costing the rest of us enormous sums of tax dollars for the repeated environmental impact reports by public agencies and court costs for injunctions and lawsuits.

No one knows accurately how many spotted owls there are since Eric Forsman, Charles Meslow, and Howard Wright (the wildlife research scientists who were the originators of the study and reports on distribution and biology of the spotted owl in Oregon) reported:

"The spotted owl population in Oregon is undoubtedly larger than indicated by our sample because we did not inventory all areas of suitable habitat in the state. We estimate that only 50-60 percent of the potential spotted owl habitat was searched for owls."

Contacts with the Umpqua National Forest supervisor's staff showed that their inventory does not show the amount of old-growth forests by age classes. Their inventory shows forest stands as large growth or young growth. With our predominately low-elevation sites in Southwest Oregon, many stands 125-150 years old resemble the 200-plus-year-old forests classed as old-growth. Thus no one knows exactly how much old-growth (trees with characteristics of 200-plus years of age) there is in Western Oregon. Further, the U.S. Forest Service states in their publication, "Habitat Management for the Spotted Owl", (released in April 1987), "we cannot say with absolute certainty what kind of habitat the spotted owl needs in order to survive."

The timber industry is the largest contributor to the economy (labor, income, taxes) of the state. Two supplemental jobs are created for each timber industry job.

Spotted owls are not an endangered species. Further, it is not known how many there are or how many are needed to maintain a viable population.

Michael Newton and Elizabeth Cole, of the Oregon State University College of Forestry, showed in a 1987 analysis that intensively managed forests at 140 years of age can have most of the stand characteristics of recognized old-growth forests, 200 years and older.

Our organization believes a way must be found to perpetuate some "ancient" or old-growth forests, and viable populations of the spotted owl should be maintained. However, an adequate supply of timber must be provided for the timber industry to avoid widespread unemployment, lost tax revenue to our communities and economic hardship.

The following plan is proposed to accomplish those objectives and to meet the demands of both the environmental groups and the timber industry. The concept was developed by the Oregon Farm Bureau's forestry committee and adopted by the Oregon Farm Bureau Board of Directors at its meeting in early May. We strongly urge the timber industry and environmental groups consider implementing a plan such as this to resolve the dispute over the spotted owl.

In each ranger district on each of the national forests in Oregon and Washington, areas of timber stands would be set aside as follows:

1. Five hundred to 800 acres of 100-year-old trees be set aside at each elevation band of 1,000 to 5,000 feet.

2. Five hundred to 800 acres of 200-year-old trees be set aside at each of the elevations listed in 1 above.

3. Five hundred to 800 acres of 300-year-old trees be set aside at the five elevations.

4. Five hundred to 800 acres of 400-year-old trees be set aside at each of the five elevations.

When the 400-year-old trees reach 500 years old, they would be harvested. At the same time, an area of 500 to 800 acres of 100-year-old trees would be selected in each ranger district. These would grow through the sequence of centuries until they reach 500 years of age when they, too, would be harvested.

Each of these areas would be selected, when possible, where a pair of spotted owls are known to exist. Such a plan should meet the demands of the environmental community as well as the timber industry since: biologists have estimated that 300 to 800 acres of suitable habitat (old-growth preferred habitat) would likely be needed to maintain a pair of owls.

2. Because of the distribution of various aged stands, the owls would also be distributed throughout the national forests and expected to provide desired genetic diversity.

3. Old-growth or ancient forest stands of 10,000 to 16,000 acres would thus be perpetuated, not preserved, in each ranger district throughout Oregon and Washington.

Some alterations of the plan would be made as scientific research becomes more specific. Immediate implementation of this concept with the support of environmental and industry groups would have several beneficial results.

1. Reduction of the confrontation and controversy with the intended savings of large amounts of money.

2. A start in meeting the objectives of the precepts outlined.

3. Allowing members of both sides of the controversy to concentrate on solving the problems instead of wasting time and human and financial resources expended in the confrontations.

It would be hoped that the implementation of such a program would allow the researchers, professional, and administrative personnel of our public agencies to get back to protecting, managing, and perpetuating all forest resources (wildlife, soils, timber, aesthetics, and recreation). The time and resources now expended on impact statements and answering charges is nonproductive.

Imagine the enormous good to our society if the millions of dollars now being spent on the controversy could be directed to reforestation and enhancement of other forestland. Under-funded youth corps programs are doing outstanding natural resource rehabilitation in Oregon and California. The sociological benefits to underprivileged and unemployed youth would alleviate many public problems.

It will take pragmatic and enthusiastic support of all groups in the controversy to bring such a solution about.

Sincerely,
(s) Doug Breese
President Oregon Farm Bureau
