Provide help for bored children

You know it will come. "I'm bored...I don't have anything to do." School is still weeks off, but your school age child has run out of activities. You know those "nothing to do" blahs can hit sometimes sooner than we think. There are remedies, notes Carol Bennett, Oregon State University Extension agent in Morrow County.

First of all, remember that doing nothing isn't always negative. Most children need a quiet, private time to do nothing and not get in anyone's way. Don't worry unless they ask you for something to do.

Giving them a project isn't always the easiest answer. Your child may need to develop skills to start his or her own projects. You may make suggestions, but sometimes the most creative projects come from the child's inspiration or from friends who are sharing the fun.

Remember the dress-up box from your child's preschool years? A project box works along the same lines.

Here are some ideas suggested by Ruth Harmelink, OSU Extension family specialist.

Storekeeping: Collect empty food boxes, cans, play money, pencils, and paper. Include a calculator. The children can set up a pretend store, shop, add prices, etc.

Circus: Include clown make-up and remover, scarves, hats and props. Visit a thrift store to stock a Circus Project Box with inexpensive costume supplies.

A Sign Kit: Cut words with large print from magazines and newspapers. Get a set of rubber letter stamps and an ink pad. Include a supply of surplus cardboard for container labels, art work, funny slogans, or bumper stickers. Think of secondary projects that would follow making a sign that says: Lemonade $.20!

Your project box can provide opportunities for successful independence. Try it.
