

Students study Thanksgiving

Mrs. Krein shows the second graders how log cabins were made and how the white people used to live in the olden days.

Second graders in Mrs. Krein's class at Heppner Elementary have been studying about the Thanksgiving holiday since the school Thanksgiving feast Thursday, Nov. 16.

Second graders came to the feast as Indians and first graders came as Pilgrims. The class has made a small community that represents the first settlement of 1620. They have learned that one of the earth's natural resources, the tree, provided needed shelter for the settlers. Students walked to the fair grounds to view the log cabin, also home for the settlers of Morrow County.

Students learned the significant role corn provided in the settler's survival that first winter.

During the month of October Mrs. Calvert's second grade and Mr. Beck's eighth grade homeroom at Heppner Elementary School combined to help better their understanding of literacy. The eighth graders joined the second graders twice as a group and then in small groups of two or three for several weeks.

Their goal was to design a reading room out of a large refrigerator box.

They first put together their ideas on paper and described them in detail. The following week the class selected favorite ideas to be used on the box. For the next few weeks, eighth graders adopted a second grader and helped the second graders construct their reading room.

Eighth graders enjoyed helping the second graders. Alissa Brownfield said "the kids were cute." Kevin Payne stated, "it was funny realizing that I was once like these kids." But most agree that the best part of the activity was missing English class.

Second graders thought the experience was fun and enjoyed the eighth graders giving them more attention. Jeff Currin said, "it was fun with the older kids." Nathan Coupal's favorite part was "thinking of ideas." Unfortunately, a downfall of the project was when eighth graders got out of hand with the paint.

For everyone, this was a well-like experience and hopefully can be done again.
