Anglers to Benefit from Several E. Oregon Fishery Projects

Anglers at many eastern Oregon locations may soon notice a marked improvement in their favorite fishery, or, in some cases, in the way they are able to use or access that fishery. Several special projects involving a variety of public agencies are underway throughout the region with goals ranging from increasing fish production and rearing capabilities to enhancing public access and usage facilities.

Still in its infancy is a watershed enhancement plan that will examine ways to improve the water quality and flow levels of the North Fork Burnt River above Unity Reservoir east of Prairie City. According to Rod Miller, a retired Forest Service wildlife biologist charged with facilitating development of the plan, the Forest Service, Soil Conservation Service and a host of other agencies will look at means of reducing unusually heavy loads of fish-threatening silt that flow through the river system and into the reservoir each year.

Among other objectives of the plan, researchers hope to develop a formula to delay peak spring runoff of the river and its tributaries, which could result in more stable reservoir levels for longer periods of time.

In another stream enhancement program, the Bonneville Power Administration is funding an ongoing project to restore steelhead spawning and rearing capabilities of Trout Creek north of Madras.

"We're looking strictly at the riparian areas," said Jerry Katt, Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife biologist involved with implementation of the project. "Trout Creek is 70 miles of mainstem and about 70 miles of tributaries. We're putting in juniper riprap, cull logs and root wads—just pretty basically getting the system back into condition."

Katt said Trout Creek was historically a major producer of young steelhead for the Deschutes River system, but years of unchecked damage to the riparian zones have virtually decimated steelhead runs there.

Trout anglers also should enjoy increased opportunity as the fishery rebuilds, Katt said. "...because once you get the habitat back—granted our bottom line is anadromous fish, which is steelhead, but if you improve one, you improve the other."

On Brownlee Reservoir of the Snake River, construction should, by now, be completed on a 60-foot extension of the upper boat ramp at Hewitt Park near Richland. Project leader Rick Traw, Baker County Roadmaster, said plans are also underway to move the retaining wall (sea wall) there back to the edge of the original river channel to create badly needed additional parking facilities. "...if—and I say if—the water leaves us alone and they don't raise it; we don't have any control over that." He said such construction would also allow the road department to create additional parking along the roadside.

Why the big push to increase launching, camping and parking facilities at such an obscure little park?

"They have it advertised all over the Northwest as probably the best warmwater fishing in the Northwest region," Traw said, adding that a joint study between ODFW and the Idaho Department of Fish and Game indicated that anglers took an estimated 2,800,000 crappies from Brownlee last year.

"That's a lot of fish," he reasoned, "but they didn't really get an accurate count because they never did count mine."

McCormack Slough on the Umatilla National Wildlife Refuge has long been a popular spot with warm water anglers, but rough fish—primarily carp—have all but taken over the fishery, says Umatilla NWR Biologist John Annear.

Construction is to begin this year on a series of dikes that will span the 400-acre slough, essentially dividing it into smaller, more manageable ponds to later be individually treated with the toxin rotenone, removing all fish. After several more suitable fish species have been reintroduced, the dikes will provide increased bank-fishing and wildlife-viewing access.

"We'll have to put something back in there," Annear said. "We haven't really decided what yet. I don't know that we'll put any bass back in there since we're pretty concerned with waterfowl production, and bass eat up a lot of birds. We'll probably go with crappies, bluegills and perch and that sort of thing."

Annear said dike construction will begin later this spring, though the work shouldn't limit continued public use of the area.

Burning program large in forest

The Heppner Ranger District of the Umatilla National Forest will have the largest Prescribed Burning Program in the history of the district during the Spring of 1990.

Prescribed burning in regeneration cut units will be conducted on 36 separate clearcut and shelterwood units distributed throughout the district. The purpose of burning is to reduce the fire hazard and to prepare the areas for planting of tree seedlings. An additional 2,000 acres will be burned under the Region 6 Natural Fuels Program. Natural fuels are those fuels that occur naturally on the forest floor and include such things as limbs, needles and dead and down tree bales. This type of burning is conducted to lessen the potential impact of wildfire.

All burning is planned to be conducted during the months of April, May and June. Locally heavy concentrations of wood smoke can be expected in and adjacent to the individual burns but should dissipate quickly. Concerns or questions about the prescribed burning program should be directed to the Heppner Ranger Station at 325 Willow View Drive in Heppner. The Heppner Ranger Station may be reached by telephone, (503) 676-9187 or 676-9188.
