

BP to supply gas to Cal's

Cal's Service Center in Heppner has announced that they are selling "BP" gas and gas products as of May 1. Bev Sherman of Cal's says that the change is because Unocal Oil company which had been supplying gas to Cal's is no longer serving this area. She says that the name of the gas station will remain the same and the change will not affect service. "We want to thank all our customers," said Sherman. "We will still give the same service as always."

EASTERN OREGON OUTDOORS

Mixed Bag at Willow Creek Reservoir

Willow Creek Reservoir southeast of Heppner could begin capturing an amount of angling limelight consistent with much larger reservoirs in the near future, if fish stocks there continue to grow and establish themselves as well as they appear to be doing now, experts say.

Constructed as recently as 1984, the 100-acre impoundment of the main and Balm forks of Willow creek is home to rainbow trout, largemouth and smallmouth bass, white and black crappie, plus bluegill and pumpkinseed sunfish. Although the fishery provides sufficient diversity to suit the tastes of almost all freshwater anglers who sample it, biologists are still uncertain just how successfully the different species will co-exist there.

"The trout populations still seem to be doing okay," said Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife District Fisheries Biologist Jim Phelps. "It was our desire to try trout in there first and not to put other species in there if the trout did well in the early stages of that reservoir, but we had volunteers who decided there were a lot of other species that belonged in there."

Phelps said the department could stock slightly larger trout (as opposed to fingerlings) each year to cut down on predation losses "...if there is still a good food supply for them--and right now there still appears to be. We'll just have to wait and see how these different populations balance out."

A rather unique attraction, especially for the bass fisherman, is the structure found near the northeastern shoreline. A long row of huge cottonwood trees rising from the water perpendicular to, but several yards from the shoreline allow eastern Oregon bassers the opportunity to fish the type of structure many of them had previously only read about. A submerged road bed runs along one side of the trees, the original creek channel on the other. Experienced bass anglers know this to spell prime largemouth habitat. A profusion of flooded willows at the nearby inlet offers additional shallow-water cover.

Although bass over three pounds of either species are rarely caught yet, local angler Steve Rhea says the smallmouths there "are thicker than hair on a dog's back," and expects them to continue growing very well, considering the lake's abundance of crawfish (a staple food item for bass) and available habitat.

"I think it's just a matter of time before we've got a real quality fishery here," he predicted, "where we're going to be booting out big largemouth and smallmouth bass. We've got the trees and the willows for the largemouths and crappie, and we've got the rocks in the Balm Fork for the smallmouth."

Trout anglers, too, will find plenty of action at the small reservoir for chunky rainbows, many in the 15- to 20-inch range.

"If they (anglers) are looking to catch some bigger trout," Rhea said, "the opportunity is there right now, and hopefully, we're going to perpetuate that."

He said regular trout gear either trolled or fished from the bank will work, while the bass prefer jigs, grubs and four-inch plastic worms. Other anglers use green and white or yellow and white panfish jigs to take crappies "by the bucketfuls."

Rhea, an active member of a special subcommittee formed to explore potential fishery and recreation enhancement projects at the new reservoir, said the tiny lake is already drawing anglers from as distant as Pendleton, Baker, LaGrande and the Tri-Cities in Washington, and expects visitors from a much broader area to sample the diverse fishery within the next five-year period.

"Your opportunity for a mixed bag is excellent," he said. "If you get tired of the trout, go try the bass and crappie--it's fun."
