

Ione youth group plans activities

By Anne Morter
The Ione youth group held its first meeting of the school year on October 17 to discuss upcoming activities. Sixteen high school students and four youth advisors enjoyed pizza and banana splits before getting down to business.

Several activities are in the planning stages for the remainder of 1990. Joel Peterson has offered to supervise a ski trip. Members also expressed an interest in baking bread and delivering it to senior citizens while Christmas caroling. A trip to Portland to work with the homeless is also being organized.

Interested members were given application forms for a "Youth as Leaders" event to be held November 9, 10 and 11 in Nampa, Idaho. The conference is sponsored by the United Church of Christ.

Reverend Esa Brown will host a program on Native American spirituality later in November.

The annual food drive will be similar to last year. Members will be invited to a taco feed after which they will collect food to be donated to the Neighborhood Center for Thanksgiving baskets.

Youth Group members are now selling Christmas trees as a money making project for the year. Douglas, grand and noble fir trees are available as well in wreaths in several sizes. The prepaid orders must be in to Jeri McElligott by November 12. Anyone wanting to order a tree may contact any youth group member or Brandi Ball at 422-7583.

The youth group is open to all high school students.

Morrow County EMT's and Pioneer Memorial Hospital wish to thank our volunteer ambulance drivers for their many years of dedication and help. We would also like to thank our new drivers who are joining our team.

All of your enthusiasm and help is greatly appreciated.

ODFW Considers Change of Big-game Regs, Application Procedures

If a recent proposal by the Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife is approved by the Oregon Fish and Wildlife Commission, the result could mean one just big-game synopsis for Oregon hunters to deal with each year, eliminating a great deal of confusion while streamlining controlled-hunt applications and general season regulations.

Under the current process, big-game regulations meetings are held in both February and June of each year to take advantage of the latest herd census information. The result is two separate synopses: the Early Controlled-hunt Regulations, often appearing only a few weeks before the limited-entry application deadline, and the General Season Regulations, appearing in early summer.

To alleviate public confusion and ease controlled-hunt application procedures, Chris Wheaton, ODFW staff big-game biologist proposed that only one set of regulatory meetings be held, which would make possible a single, combined synopsis of both controlled-hunt and general-season regulations which could be available to hunters as early as January 1 of each year. If approved, the new system could be in place by January of 1992.

"If the commission decides to go along with it--and so far they've acted favorably--we would put a notice in the early big game regs that come out this February or March," Wheaton said. "This would be so people would get a year's advance notice that a change was coming; we don't want to spring changes in application dates and that kind of thing on people without giving them a lot of advance notice."

Wheaton said the application deadline for limited-entry and controlled hunts would be moved to March 1 to allow sufficient time to enter data from an ever-increasing number of hunt applicants into the department's computer system. In June, after herd wintering survival and other census data had been collected by biologists, the regulation-setting meeting would be held and the number of available tags for each area would be finalized by the commission.

"As soon as that decision was made," Wheaton said, "all the people who had applied would have already been entered into the computer, so we'd just plug in the number of permits that the commission accepted and immediately start issuing tags. And that mailing would be done by about the 15th of July at the latest--probably a couple of weeks earlier than that."

One apparent problem with the system is that hunters would have to apply for limited-entry or controlled hunts before the actual number of available permits was known.

"I think the most appropriate course--and this is just in the thinking stage--is to list the last year's tag numbers and the last year's percent chance of drawing," Wheaton said. "And then you'd have to put a prominent notice in there that actual tag numbers are going to be established after winter conditions are assessed and after the condition of the herds are counted by the biologists and so forth. I think that's the best we can do under those circumstances."

Wheaton said the notice could also include references to the current winter conditions and how they may affect allotted tag numbers in some areas.

Wheaton said that overall, the commission has so far looked favorably upon the proposal and has directed the department to proceed with its development.

"What we're going to do next is go out and fine-tune this thing with our biologists--and we'll also be talking about it at the public meeting for the big-game regulations coming up in January and February and we'd like the public to tell us what they think about it. If the public is favorably disposed toward it and the commission wants to go with it, we'll be putting that notice out in the early big-game regs next year."
