Letters to the Editor

To the Editor:
The Columbia Gorge Commission is facing the battle of trying to sell a preservation plan for the Gorge that annihilates local control and private property rights. Now Richard Benner, the author of the Gorge plan, has been selected to head up the LCDC staff.

Mr. Benner, through his 12 years on the staff of 1000 Friends of Oregon, and his recent tenure with the Gorge commission, brings to the state planning agency a history of social manipulation through the land use process. His efforts are replete with a desire to trample the last vestige of individual property rights that used to be a part of the heritage of Oregon.

I can only imagine the volume of the out-cry from the environmentalists if the commission had appointed a logger or a developer as director of the Department of Land Conservation and Development. The marble halls of Salem would shatter from the response.

The "new" Oregon, home of the spotted owl, the old trees, the apartment dweller, the bus rider and the extinct land owner. Things certainly do look different up here.

My fervent hope is that this latest action on the part of our 1000 Friends at the state Capitol will awaken the silent (and to often complacent) majority of Oregonians to the very real threat to our rights as property owners. Please, people, get involved.
