Plans underway for annual alumni basketball tournament

Plans are once again underway for the annual men's and women's Alumni Basketball tournament to be held December 27, 28 and 29 at Heppner High School.

Team captains are encouraged to be contacting their alumni teammates so that rosters can be filled and T-shirts ordered.

The men's portion of the tournament will run with the same format of eight teams according to chairman Stuart Dick.

The women's basketball will sport a new look with the possibility of dividing up into three or four competitive teams to round out the women's side of the bracket.

Volleyball will be included again with a tournament held at the Jr. High Gym. The volleyball tournament will be run similar to last year with minor changes says organizer Suzie Hisler.

More details on the tournament will appear at a later date.

OWGL convention scheduled

The Oregon Wheat Growers League will hold its 64th annual convention in Portland, Oregon, December 1-4 at the Red Lion/Loyd Center. Guest speakers will include Ann Veneman, deputy secretary for the department of Agriculture; Jane Wittmeyer from the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation; Rasool Baloch from the embassy of Pakistan; Dr. Graham Gall of the University of California-Davis; and Richard Munn from the Department of Revenue, as well as research panels and congressional representatives. The agenda will be packed with informative and interesting speakers and topics.

OWGL convention scheduled

The theme of this year's convention is 'Coalition: Maximum Yield' and continues the focus on coalitions that has been the hallmark of OWGL President Paul Schanno during his year in that office. 'One organization of agriculture cannot stand alone; strength lies in numbers, stated Schanno.

In addition to business sessions, the growers' group has planned an extensive trade and exhibit show and a number of social functions. Spouses will have activities to choose from. Including a trip to Saks Fifth Avenue and a demonstration and sampling by renowned perfumer Chris Tsefalas of The Perfume House, Portland.

For further information or registration details, please contact the OWGL office at (503) 276-7330 before November 22.

Missionary trip to Russia gives new focus on sharing

Switching roles from retired Gooseberry farmers to missionaries going into countries once dominated by communism gave Roland and Donna Bergstrom a renewed perspective on the basics to sustain life and the hunger for religion by people who have not been allowed to worship freely.

In September the Bergstroms joined others for a three-week trip into Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia and Russia. And according to Donna, "This was not just another sight-seeing trip; we were there for the business of carrying the word of God."

It took lots of prayers for this Valby Lutheran Church couple to decide if they should risk personal safety and go on this mission, Donna said. But they joined an 11-member volunteer team of "prayer warriors" in New York City for a two-day orientation before flying to Frankfurt, Germany.

Since she first heard Dr. Bob Heil speak many years ago, Donna said she has followed his work as he answered the call to help train religious leaders in under privileged and communist countries. Dr. Heil has arranged many of these non-denominational missions at the International Leadership Training Institute in Columbus, Ohio. He developed a three-year program for leaders in out-reach ministries throughout the world.

Going into those countries on the heels of the Russian coup took courage. But they "went on faith," Donna said, hoping the Lord would take care of them. As Americans, it was unusual not to know where they might find shelter along the way. However they were warmly received in some homes in spite of a language barrier.

With much forethought, the Bergstroms packed very few changes of clothing for the trip, but their three suitcases were crammed with food and other things that they gave to host families as gifts. They bought inexpensive digital watches for children, packages of M and M's and they were given fountain pens and cosmetics to distribute.

They also had the foresight to take sleeping bags for the nights spent on an old bus without bathroom facilities. They found that although Russian host families are rationed as to how much food they can buy, there was plenty of food available at that time of year. "It could be a different story during the winter," Donna said, as they seem to lack an adequate distribution system.

The average Russian wage in rubles is equal to $10 American dollars per month. Everyone has a job and they are paid whether they show up or work or not. They don't seem to understand job performance in order to hold a job, so many Russians who immigrate to this country go back home after being here for a year, Donna said.

Soviet towns are mostly dull and shoddy, Donna said. The buildings are cheaply constructed. And many Moscow Russians live in high rise apartment buildings where extended families live in cramped quarters. They have few luxuries but they keep their apartments clean, she said. She added, however, that the hall ways looked as though they were never swept.

Both the Catholic and Protestant religion exist in Russia, and people there are finding the courage to worship again, Donna said. But Russian people seem so depressed—they never smile in public. People attending church sit very still. They never move, she said. It became obvious to her that Russia women have no active church roles, men and women sit in separate areas of the church.

Since this missionary group carried medical supplies in addition to religious literature, their bus had a Red Cross sign which made border crossings much easier. People are often detained there for days, they said. And vehicles are driven over a pit where they can be inspected thoroughly.

From Kiev, after a long hassle of obtaining airplane tickets, the Bergstroms flew to Moscow. After spending three days there, they again struggled to obtain airplane passage home. They spent a day and one night at the Moscow airport.

"It's an experience we might not ever again undertake," Donna said. "But it certainly made me more aware of how much we take for granted." Along with helping to plant seeds to help Russians regain their faith in God, she said the experience gave her a new focus on wanting to share more with others.
