Mail Order Drugs: The Wrong Prescription For You

Many consumers are being asked to make a decision that can have serious consequences to their health. They are being asked, often coerced, by their employer or insurance plan to purchase their prescription drugs through the mail.

It's a decision that could cost you your health—even your life.

Today's prescription drugs are powerful medicines—carefully chosen by your physician and carefully dispensed by your pharmacist. Personal contact with your pharmacist ensures that the potent medicines you are taking do what your doctor intends. Your neighborhood pharmacist is available to make sure you understand how your drugs should be used. He checks your doctor's prescription for accuracy, dosage, and method of administration, and alerts you to any potential side effects or interactions.

Most patients go to more than one physician. Only your neighborhood pharmacist, who keeps a profile of all the medications you are taking, is in a position to determine if one drug you are taking will interact dangerously with another prescribed by another doctor. Your pharmacist is also often aware of over-the-counter medicines you take and special dietary restrictions that can cause adverse reactions to your prescription medication. Your pharmacist also generally makes home deliveries and will assist you in an emergency—24 hours a day.

When you choose mail order, you sacrifice all these services, and you risk your health.

Ask yourself these questions before you buy drugs through the mail:

- How long will my drug treatment be delayed if my shipment is lost or stolen?
- How can I be sure the drugs I receive are still potent after travelling through the mail?
- Who will make sure I'm not taking drugs that will interact badly with each other?
- If I'm forced to buy large quantities through the mail, what will I do with the wasted medicine?
- How will I know if I'm really using my medication properly?
- What do I do in an emergency?

When you buy your prescriptions through the mail, you're just a number, along with countless others processed and shipped from hundreds of miles away. The potential for error in these assembly line mail order operations is enormous. The United States Congress was concerned enough to hold hearings on these operations. One consumer from Virginia Beach, Virginia testified at those hearings that she was the victim of a potentially deadly mail order mix-up, but that her local pharmacist confirmed the mistake when she noticed that her pills looked different.

A 70-year-old Idaho woman wasn't so lucky. She died, reportedly after taking the wrong prescription drugs sent to her through the mail.

Mail order drugs are no bargain. Your health is much too important to be placed at such risk.
