Medicines Used to Treat Hair Loss

In the majority of cases, hair loss in adults is a normal process that occurs with aging. Certain diseases such as lupus and medicines such as those used in the treatment of certain cancers and circulatory disorders can cause temporary hair loss. Exposure to dyes, peroxides, straighteners, and other alkaline chemicals can damage follicles and cause hair loss. Hair loss in children is most likely due to fungal infections, but can occur with nutritional deficiencies, trauma, or congenital metabolic problems.

In both men and women, the most common form of hair loss is androgenic alopecia. This is sometimes referred to as male-pattern baldness, a condition that affects about half of all men by age 50. Skin and hair specialists indicate that male-pattern baldness usually needs no treatment unless psychological effects of balding are severe. Treatment options include hairpieces, transplants, and medicines.

Medicines that have been used to treat androgenic alopecia include estrogens, progestins, cimetidine, dexamethasone, and flutamide. Topical minoxidil (Rogaine) is the most popular medicine used for this type of baldness. Minoxidil seems to work best when applied at the top of the scalp during the early stages of hair thinning. Hair growth may be sparse, and the medicine must be applied indefinitely.
