Donkey Basketball

Shelly Huth stretches out for the ball during donkey basketball last Thursday. Also trying for the ball is Steve Dickenson (left) and Jim Hayes.

Bill Ewing makes a shot from donkey back. Proceeds from the donkey basketball went towards the senior class graduation trip to San Francisco.

Insects invade kitchen cupboards

Insects consume from 10 to 50 percent of all stored grain worldwide, according to Jack DeAngelis, entomologist with the Oregon State University Extension Service.

In Oregon, there are several kinds of pests that can invade stored foods. Grainary weevil, Indian meal moths, flour beetles, drugstore or cigarette beetles and spider beetles are among the culprits that invade and feed in your pantry.

"Dry pet food is the most commonly overlooked source of infestation," says DeAngelis.

To avoid infestations, DeAngelis offers the following recommendations:

Do not store items in the pantry or cupboards longer than two months.

Do not store foods in thin plastic supermarket bags, insects can chew right through them. Use heavy plastic, metal or glass containers.

Freeze products to store them for longer time periods. Freezing can also effectively eliminate many pests.

Discard infested material to keep the pests from spreading to other foods.

Grainary weevils are small beetles that live on whole grain kernels. Adult Indian meal moths are about five-eighths of an inch across the wings. Their wings have a broad, dark band. The larvae infest grain, dried fruits, seeds, crackers, nuts, powdered milk, bird seed, dry pet food and cereals. Weevils produced by larvae can commonly be found in foods infested by the Indian meal moth.

Flour beetles can subsist on flour, dried peas, beans, shelled nuts, dried fruits and spices. One generation is completed in seven weeks to three months.
