"THIS ISN'T JUST A ROTTEN LOG, IT'S MY HOME"

Scientists have learned a lot by listening to Nature. And now we know Oregon's second-growth forests grow best... and wildlife thrive...when we listen and respect Nature's rules.

THE TRICK IS TO LISTEN

Nature taught us that leaving organic matter, like rotten logs on the ground, has many benefits. Frogs, salamanders, mice and other wildlife use the logs as homes. We listened and learned.

We also leave standing dead trees. That's where woodpeckers, squirrels and insects live. Nature knew that... now so do we.

And the next time you see your reflection in a forest stream and wonder how the water stays so clean and clear... look at the trees and shrubs that line its banks. It's Nature's way of maintaining streambanks to keep soil and sediment out.

Today, the Oregon Forest Practices Act requires forest landowners to leave logs and trees to provide important habitat for wildlife. Equipment must be kept away from streams and a buffer of trees and shrubs left to protect water quality.

WE LISTENED AND LEARNED A LOT

As we continue to listen and learn, we will work with Nature to grow new forests that provide us:

THE ENVIRONMENT WE ALL WANT
AND THE WOOD PRODUCTS WE ALL NEED.
