Medicines for Multiple Sclerosis

An estimated 250,000 to 350,000 Americans suffer from multiple sclerosis, a disorder of the central nervous system. Multiple sclerosis is thought to be caused by a virus. Nerve damage results from a deterioration of the myelin sheath, the fatty covering surrounding and protecting nerve tissue. Once this fatty protective cover is lost, certain body functions may be impaired. In the more advanced stages of multiple sclerosis, such as with severe nerve damage, the person affected may lose control of certain muscles and need to be confined to a wheelchair.

Symptoms of multiple sclerosis may include bowel and bladder problems, fatigue, difficulty in walking, sweating, pain in the joints, loss of vision, sexual dysfunction, and mood swings. After the first attack, often there may be a period of remission (a time with no symptoms) that can last from a few months to three years.

While there is no cure for or way to prevent this condition, there are several agents being evaluated to help control symptoms. The first prescription medicine approved for multiple sclerosis was an antiviral drug, beta interferon, which has been shown to be partially effective in patients with relapsing-remitting multiple sclerosis. Other medicines being investigated include copolymer 1 and purified bovine myelin.
